International Education: Broadening Your Business Horizons

Employers
As Australia’s fourth largest export, the international education sector was worth almost $35 billion to the economy in 2018 and supports more than 240,000 jobs. That’s putting a whole lot of good back into business.

But the benefits of international education don’t stop there. More and more employers are realising the value of a diverse, globally minded workforce. Australian employers also need a diverse and sustainable talent pool to drive growth, and remain competitive in a global economy.

Here are our top five ways international students and graduates can broaden the horizons of your business or organisation.
Embracing diversity and different perspectives benefits everyone in the workplace. Employees from different cultural backgrounds working together on common goals can improve business and team performance, through sharing ideas and fresh perspectives on problem solving.

For international students, gaining work experience in an Australian organisation is a valuable opportunity to put their learning into action. Hands-on, practical experience enhances their understanding of Australian business practice and helps them to develop strong networks and stay connected with Australia, long after they have returned home.

For Australian workers and employers, working with people from different nationalities, cultures and ethnicities provides valuable opportunities to understand cultural context, and prepares them to respond to opportunities in an increasingly global economy.

In 2016, QS Enrolment Solutions conducted a survey of Australian employers to get their perspectives on hiring international students. Here’s what they identified as the key benefits:

- Diversity: 58%
- Global perspective/network: 53%
- Multilingual workplace: 41%
- New skills: 29%
- Stronger work ethic: 29%
- Other: 7%
“It is a great asset to have a diversity of people within our organisation who not only have a language capability, but the cultural understanding of who we’re dealing with in our business.”

“Business is global. We need to focus on those skills that everybody brings to an organisation.”

Soft skills like teamwork, lateral thinking, project management and communication capabilities are important in any workplace. The changing nature of work requires additional skills and competencies, including adaptability, innovation and entrepreneurial mindsets.

International students are highly mobile, motivated and resilient. Having made the journey to live and study in a new country, often with limited networks, they are able to adapt and often thrive outside of their comfort zone. They bring their knowledge of their home culture and languages, and are keen to share their expertise and expand their networks.

For international students and graduates, taking up a part-time job can provide a vital opportunity to become part of our broader community – not only can they improve their job-related skills, they can also sharpen their English proficiency and cultural awareness on their journey towards a global career.

Many international students hail from service-based cultures which emphasise respect, hard work and loyalty. This can manifest a strong work ethic when welcomed into Australian workplaces, as well as a desire to give back to local communities.

The world is truly a global village. The digital age, and increasingly diverse social networks, enable us to travel and communicate across borders faster than ever before. Local success rests on our capacity to respond to global market changes and challenges.

Multilingual, culturally aware employees are also better able to communicate directly with diverse customer bases and growing international tourism markets.

International students and graduates bring knowledge of their home cultures and can provide a vital link between local customers and global markets. This knowledge can help to better target your products and services through increased understanding of business and social etiquette, cultural nuances, and language and communication styles. These skills are in increasingly high demand and can be applied across many sectors and roles – from customer service to business development and more.

Through engaging with international students and graduates, you can enhance how your business responds to your customers and international markets, leading to better business outcomes.

Australian employers need a diverse and sustainable talent pool to drive growth and remain competitive in a global economy.

Engaging with international students and graduates in your business can help you to develop new products, export markets and global connections. Businesses that boast multilingual, culturally aware employees can offer stronger service to a broad consumer market, and can connect with business partners from all over the world. These competencies present an advantage for business in terms of exploring trade and investment channels, products and services, which can lead to greater competitiveness in the global market.

Australia’s international alumni forge vital links across the globe. Whether graduates return to their home country or take up opportunities in another destination, they drive Australia’s connectedness with the Asian region and beyond. Some go on to become leaders and entrepreneurs in their chosen professions. Through these global alumni networks there is potential for fruitful research, trade and business relationships and a lifelong connection back to Australia.

By 2030, services could become Australia’s main export to Asia and support more than one million Australian jobs.

(Asialink Business, 2015)

Over 80 percent of international students between 2000–2014 returned to their home countries (or went to another destination), creating lifelong links between Australia and the rest of the world.

(Department of Home Affairs 2018)

Over the last 50 years, Australia has educated more than 2.5 million international students. These connections enhance business links and mutual understanding across the globe.

“For any company that has a vision or a mission, especially beyond the boundary or territory of Australia, there’s a very unique value that international students can bring.”

Hiring exceptional talent is a challenge for every organisation – particularly in a world of increasing competition and rapidly changing business and consumer needs. That is why it’s important not to overlook international students and graduates. Being open to a wide pool of talent enables Australian businesses to attract the best candidate for a role, regardless of their cultural background or visa type. Broadening the talent pool can also help to fill gaps in local markets and address skills shortages in key sectors and regional areas.

A competitive graduate labour market, shifting visa legislation and ‘fear of the unknown’ can deter many employers from hiring or engaging international students. Some organisations also have restrictive policies that require permanent residence for ongoing roles.

But engaging with international students and graduates is easier than you think. There are many options to discover new talent and provide students with valuable workplace experience. These include:

- Mentoring
- Internships
- Work-integrated learning
- Part-time, casual roles
- Graduate programs or other permanent, paid employment
- State or territory sponsorship
- Employer sponsorship

Did you know?

International students can work for up to 40 hours per fortnight during study periods, and unlimited hours during study breaks. This not only supports their living expenses while in Australia, but provides them with valuable opportunities to enhance their English, gain experience in the workplace and become more involved with the local community.
